Abstract

Marriage is one of the important choices in life, which not only affects one's life but also has an impact on personal development. Marriage could make an individual a member of a family. Such kind of role transformation allows people to experience different lifestyles and responsibilities. In order to maintain family stability, people need more communication and coordination. This process helps cultivate people's sense of responsibility and achievement. As a way of life, entertainment is a way of making people happy. When you work for a whole busy day, entertainment allows your tired body and mind to relax a certain extent.

However, due to the marriage, will it have a significant change in a person's way of entertainment? This project aims to explore this issue by comparing the differences in entertainment activities between different genders before and after marriage. To solve the main problem, I separate them into different gender and analyze the difference.

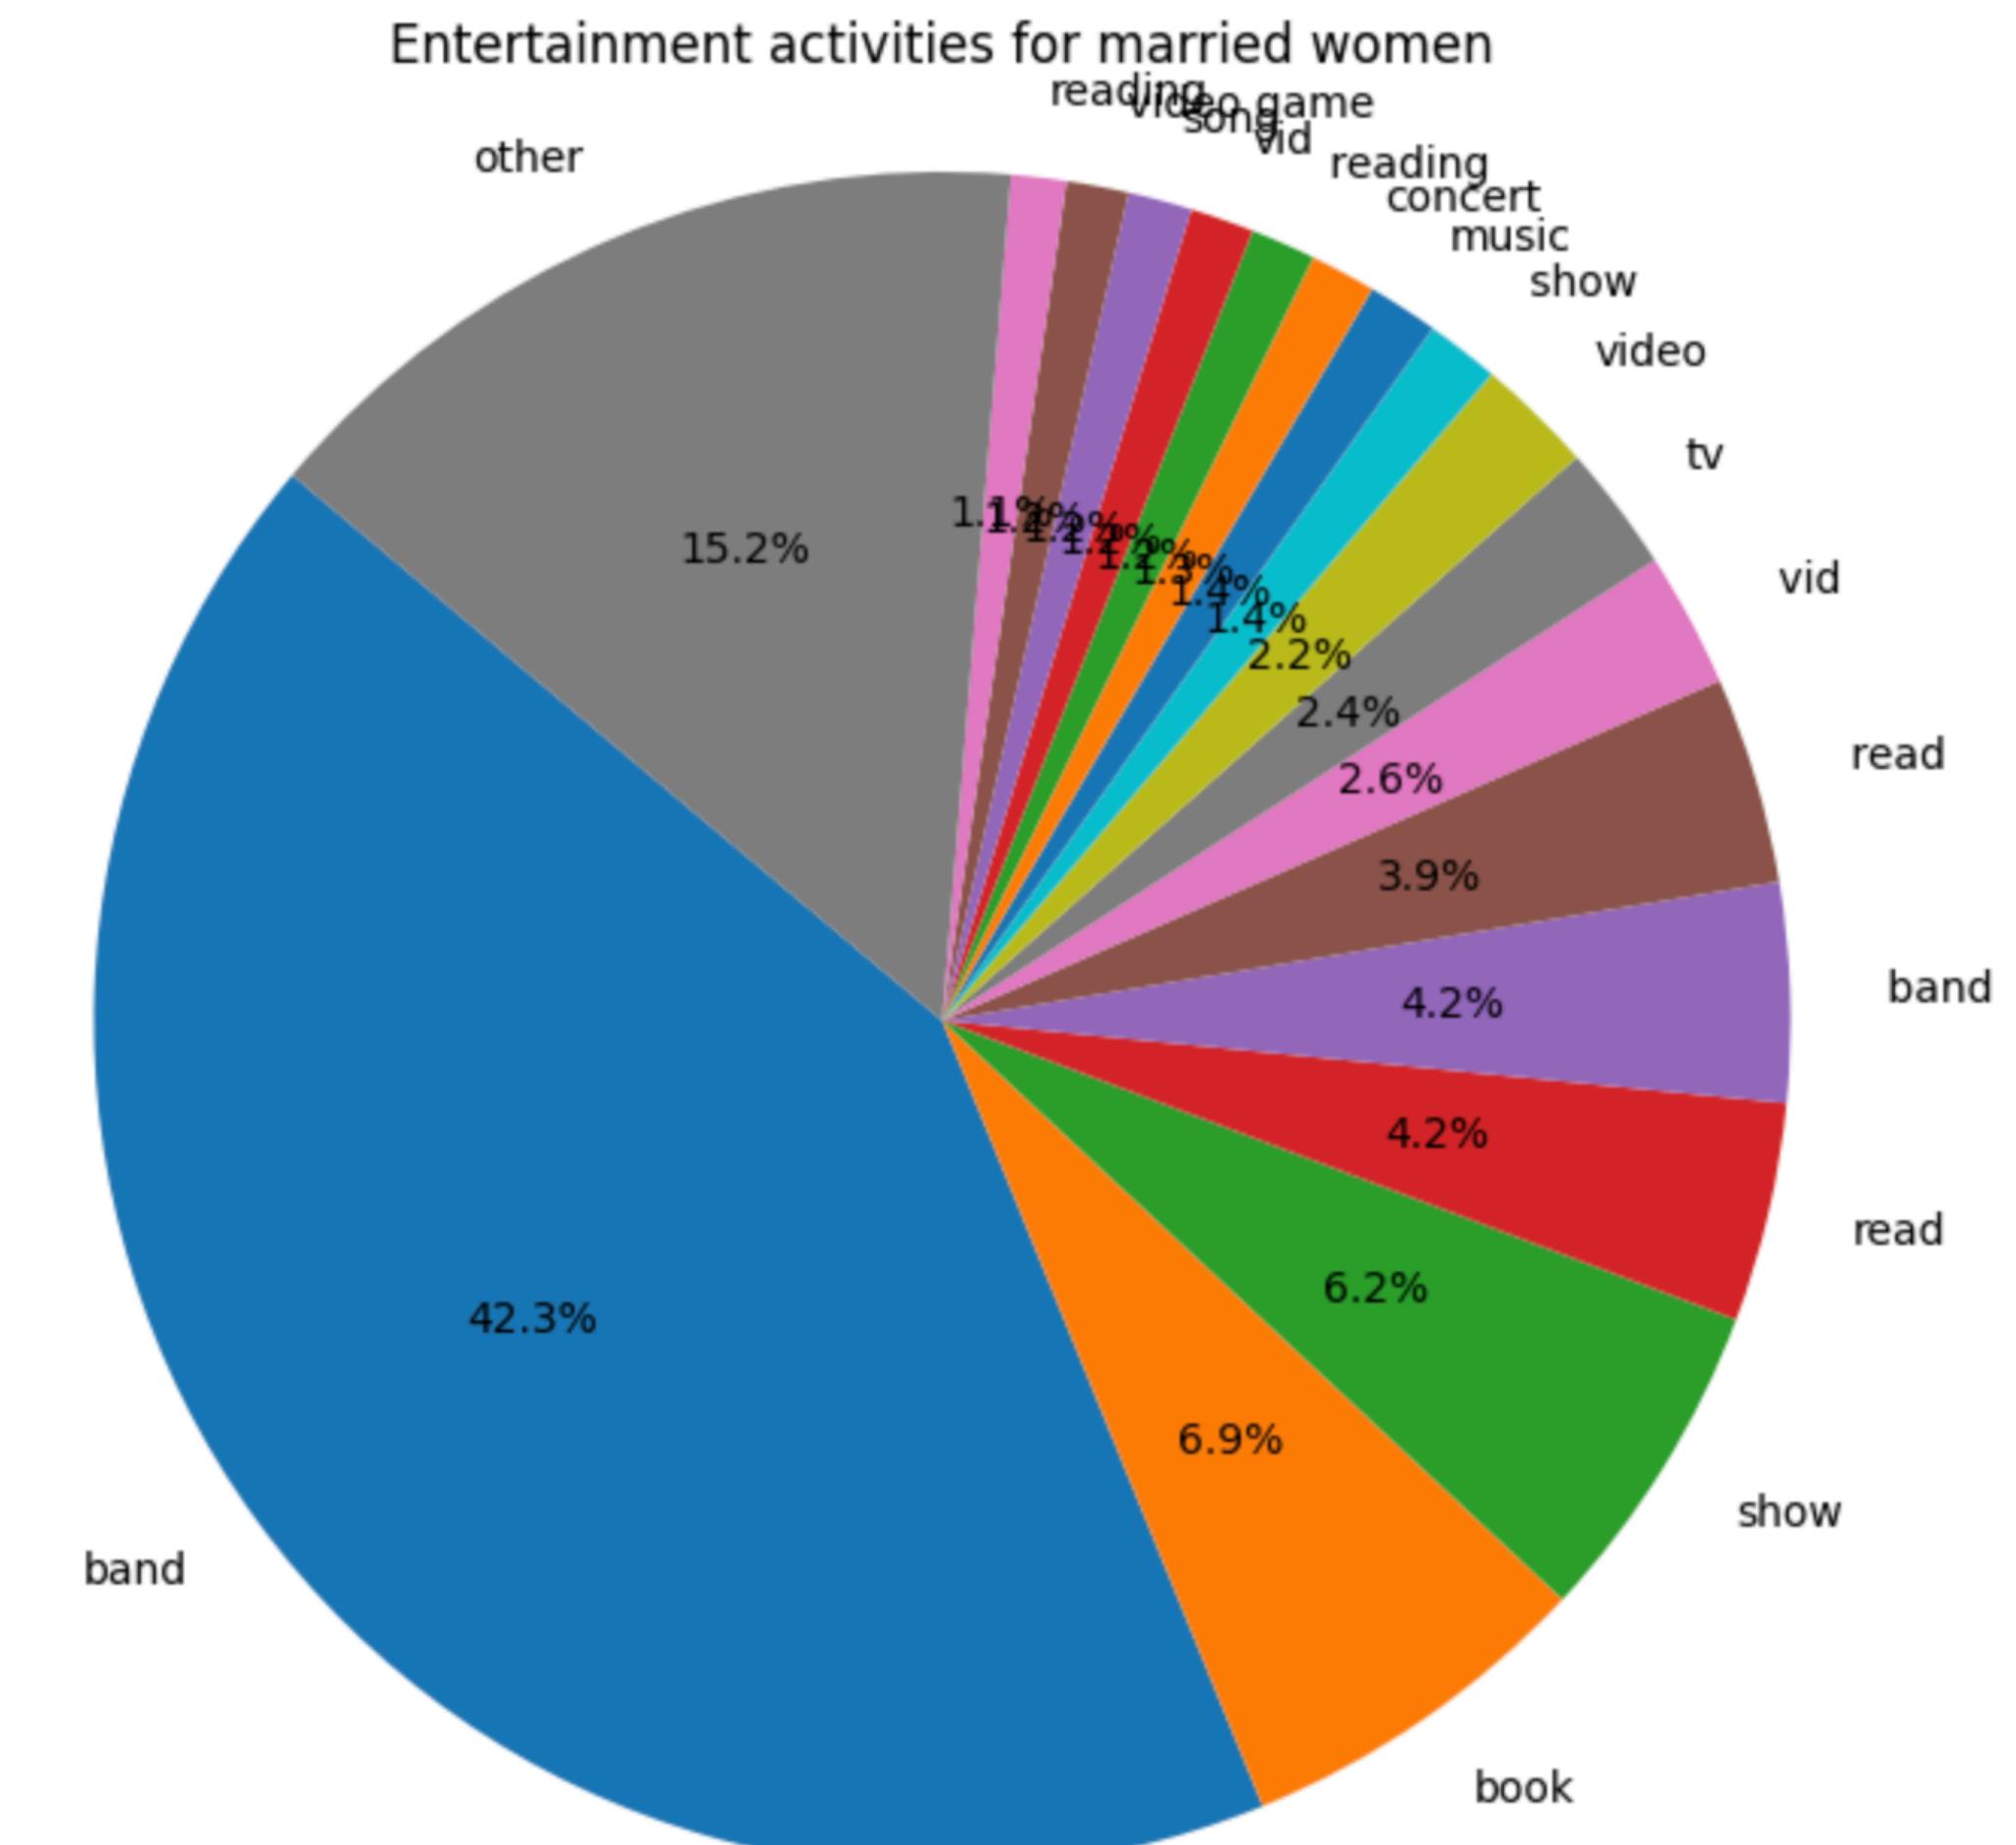

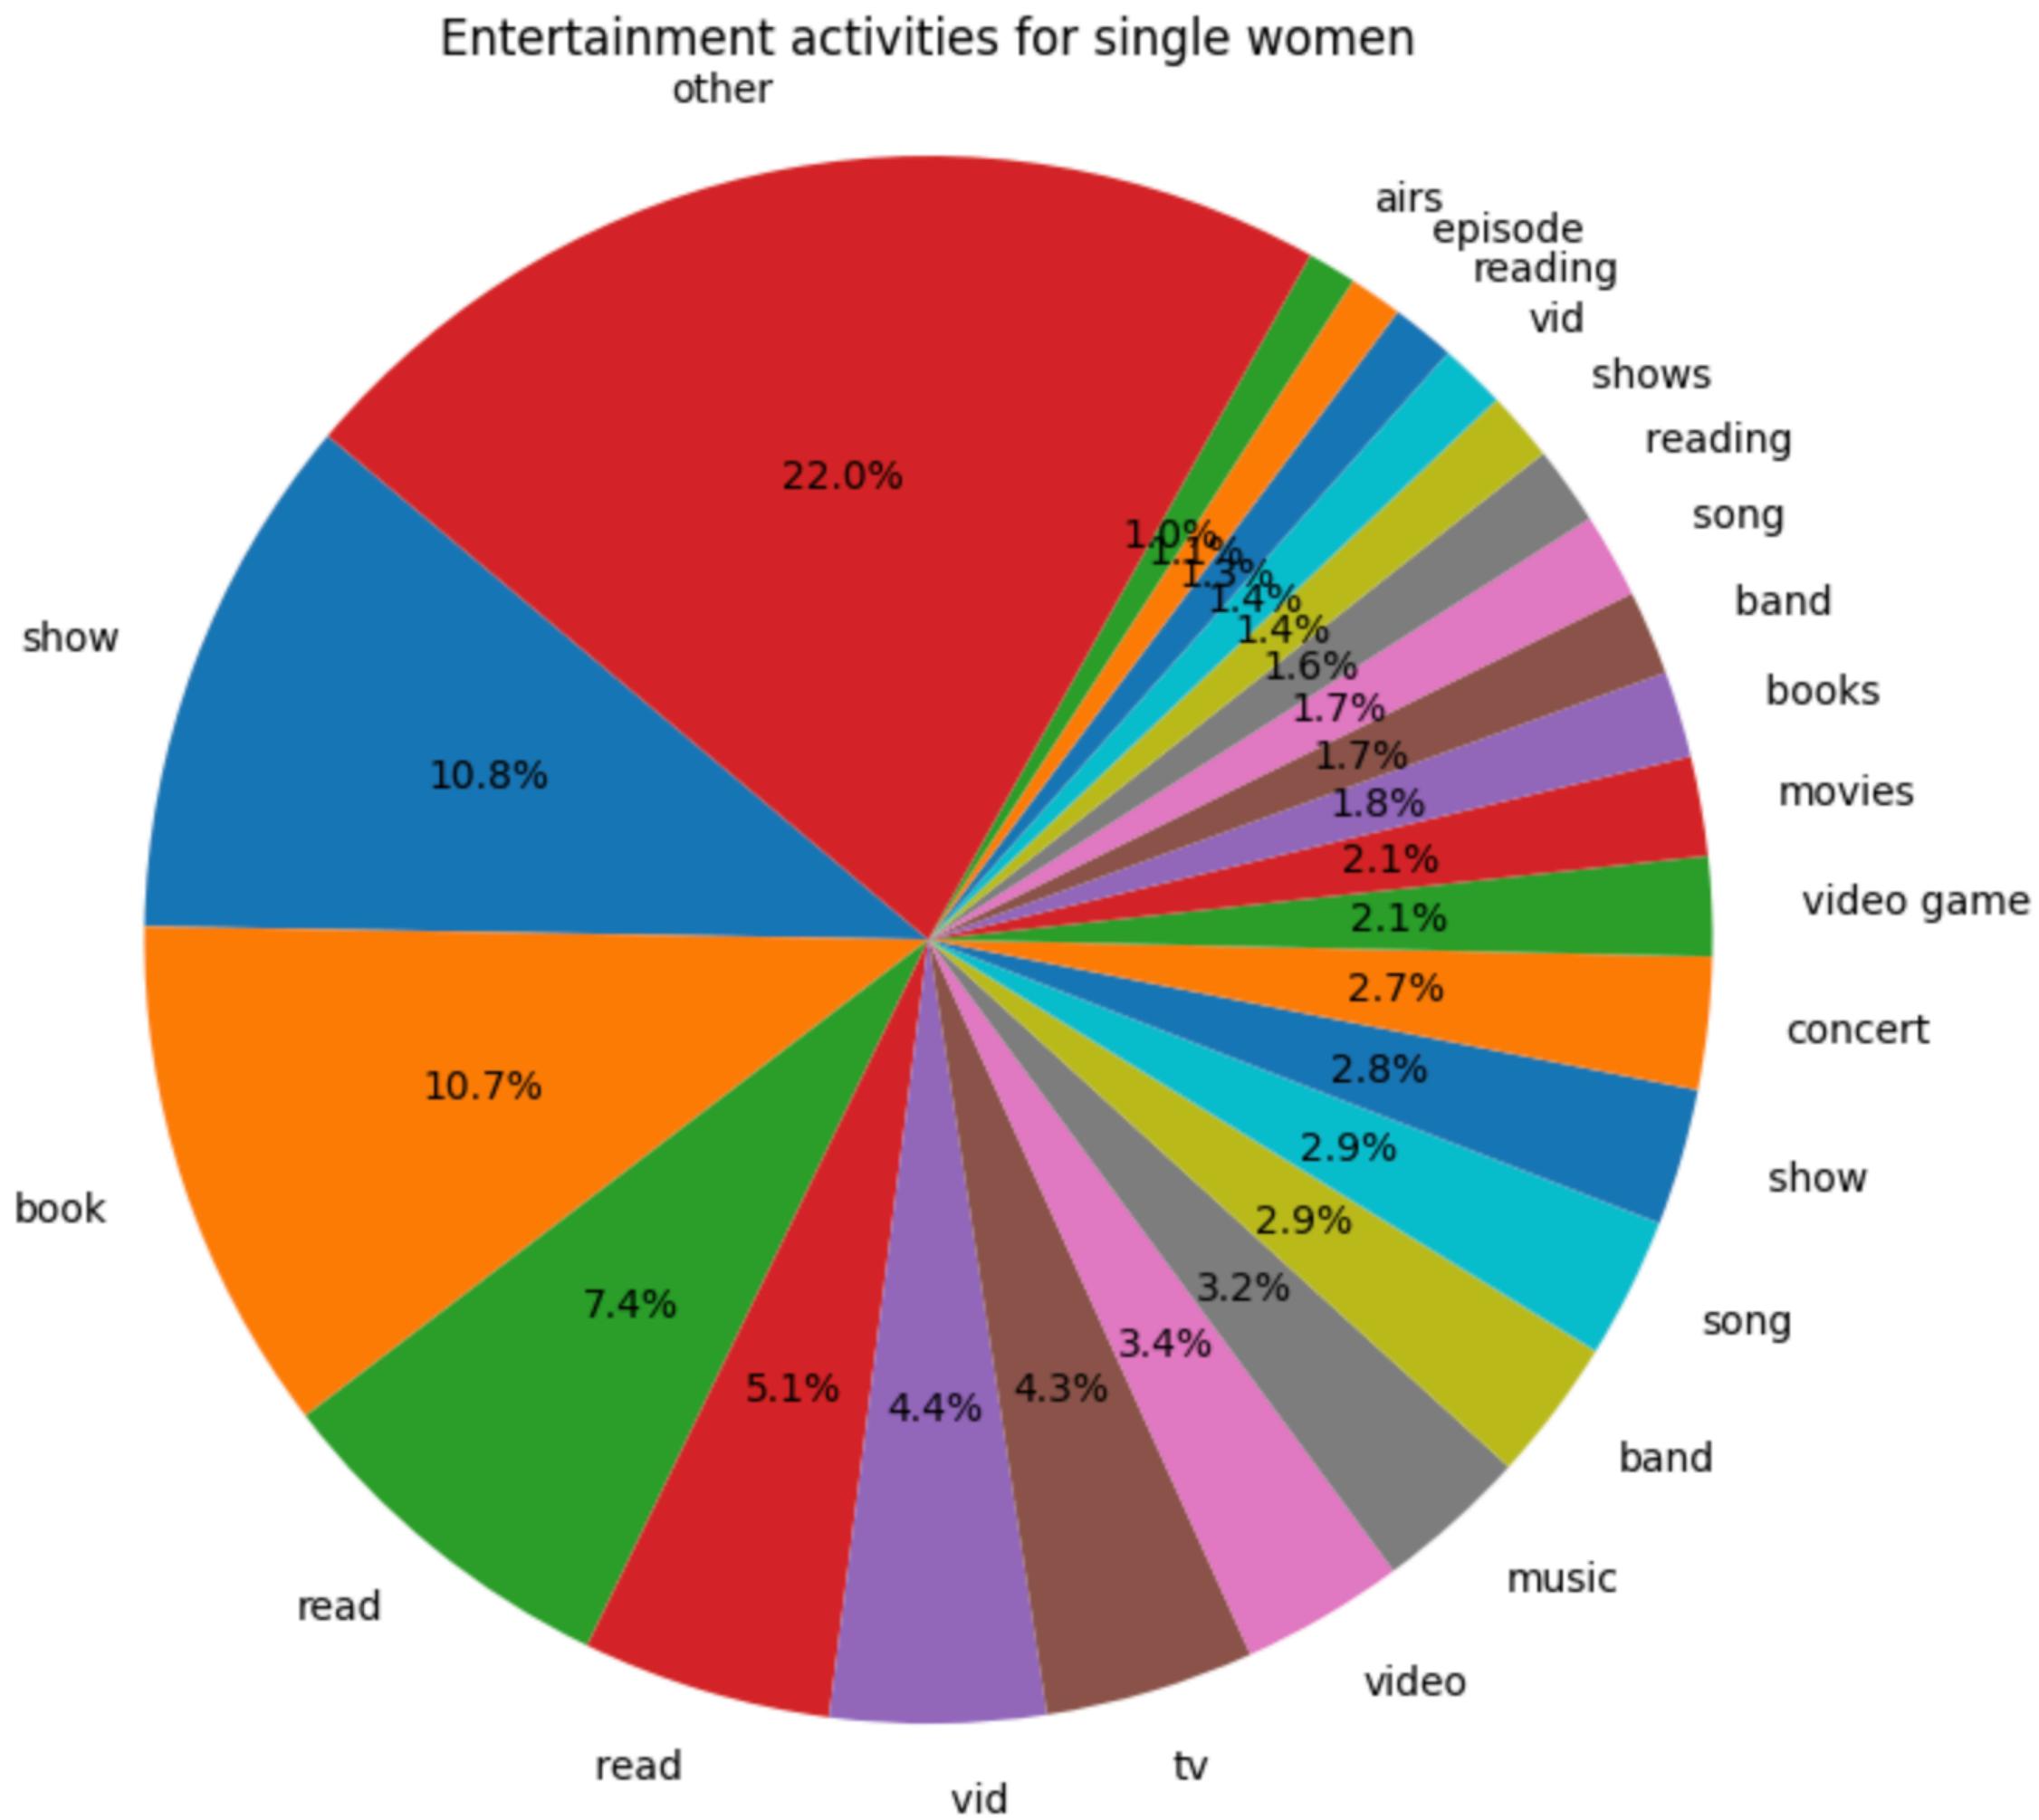

Comparison between single men and married men

Based on the pie charts provided, we observe distinct patterns in entertainment preferences between married and single men. Single men tend to allocate a larger share of their leisure time to interactive entertainment, such as video games, which account for a significant 10.8% of their activities, compared to 4.8% for married men. In contrast, married men show a stronger desire for reading which makes up 8.9% of their entertainment, suggesting a possible shift towards more intellectual pursuits after marriage. This could reflect the greater amount of free time typically available to those without marital obligations. Those single men have preference for entertainment that can be enjoyed in shorter and more flexible time segments. In addition, music remains a staple in the lives of both married and single men. Though the form of music varies, there is a slightly higher tendency for married men to attend live concerts.

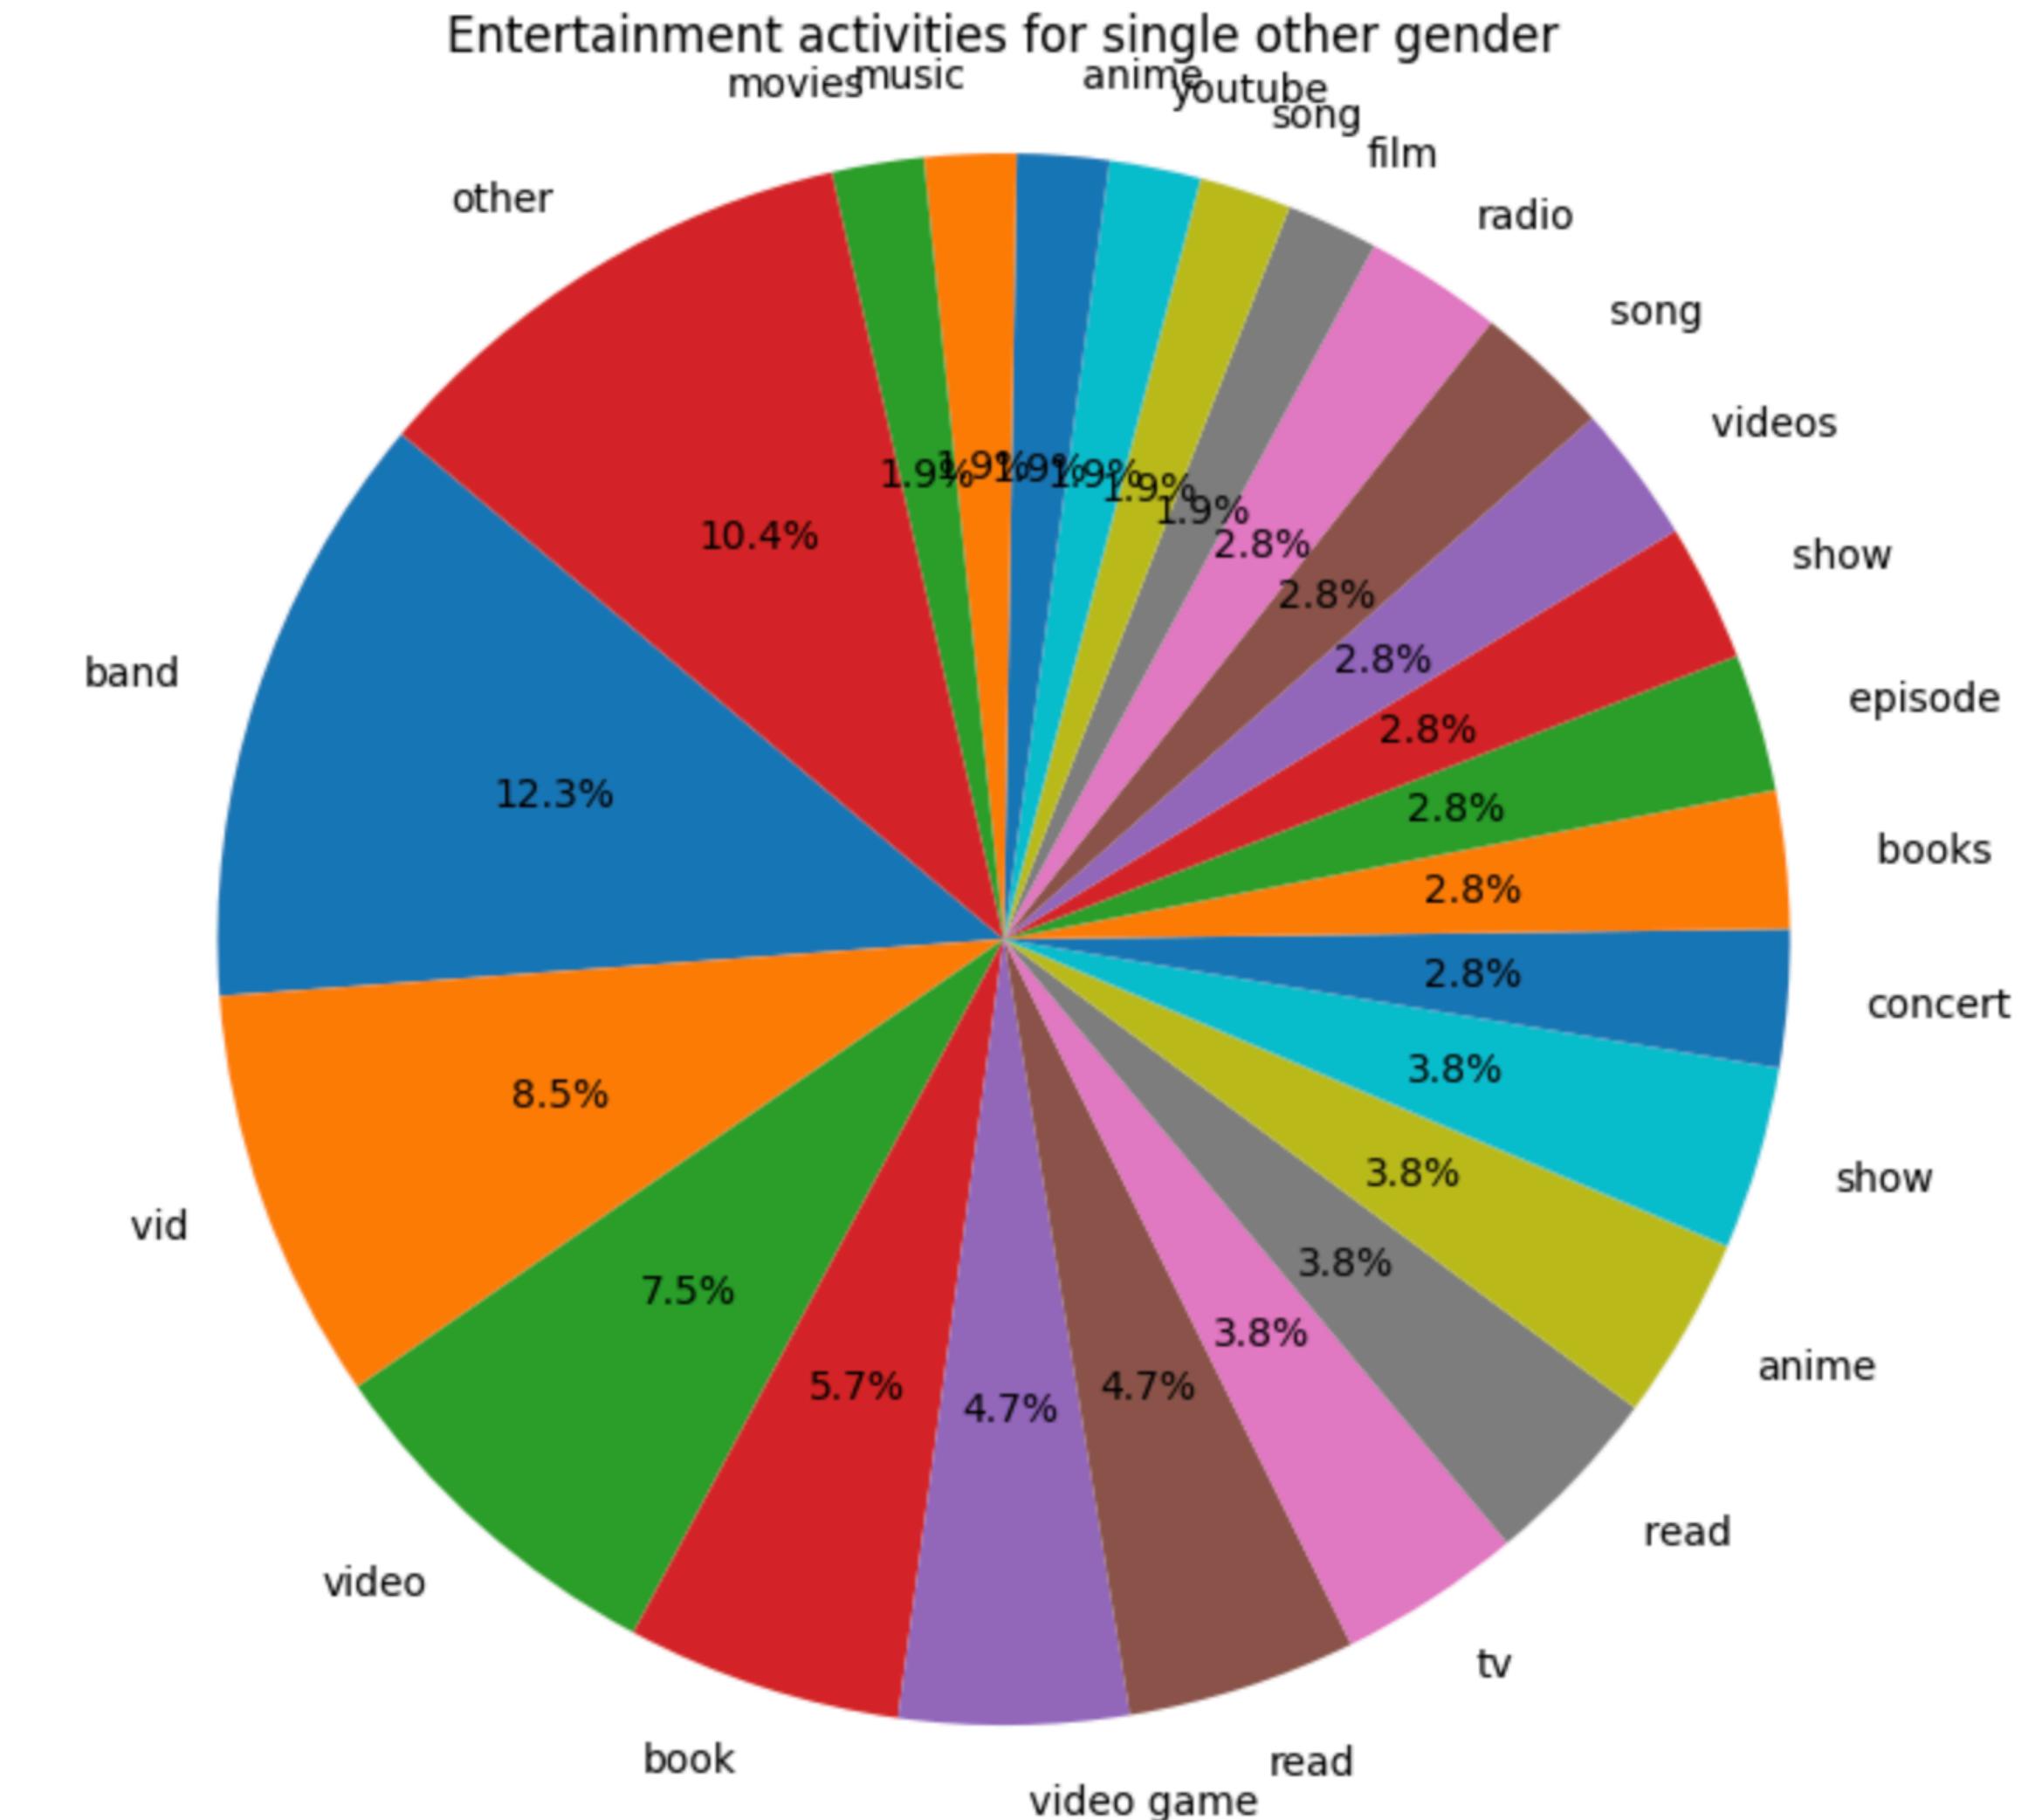

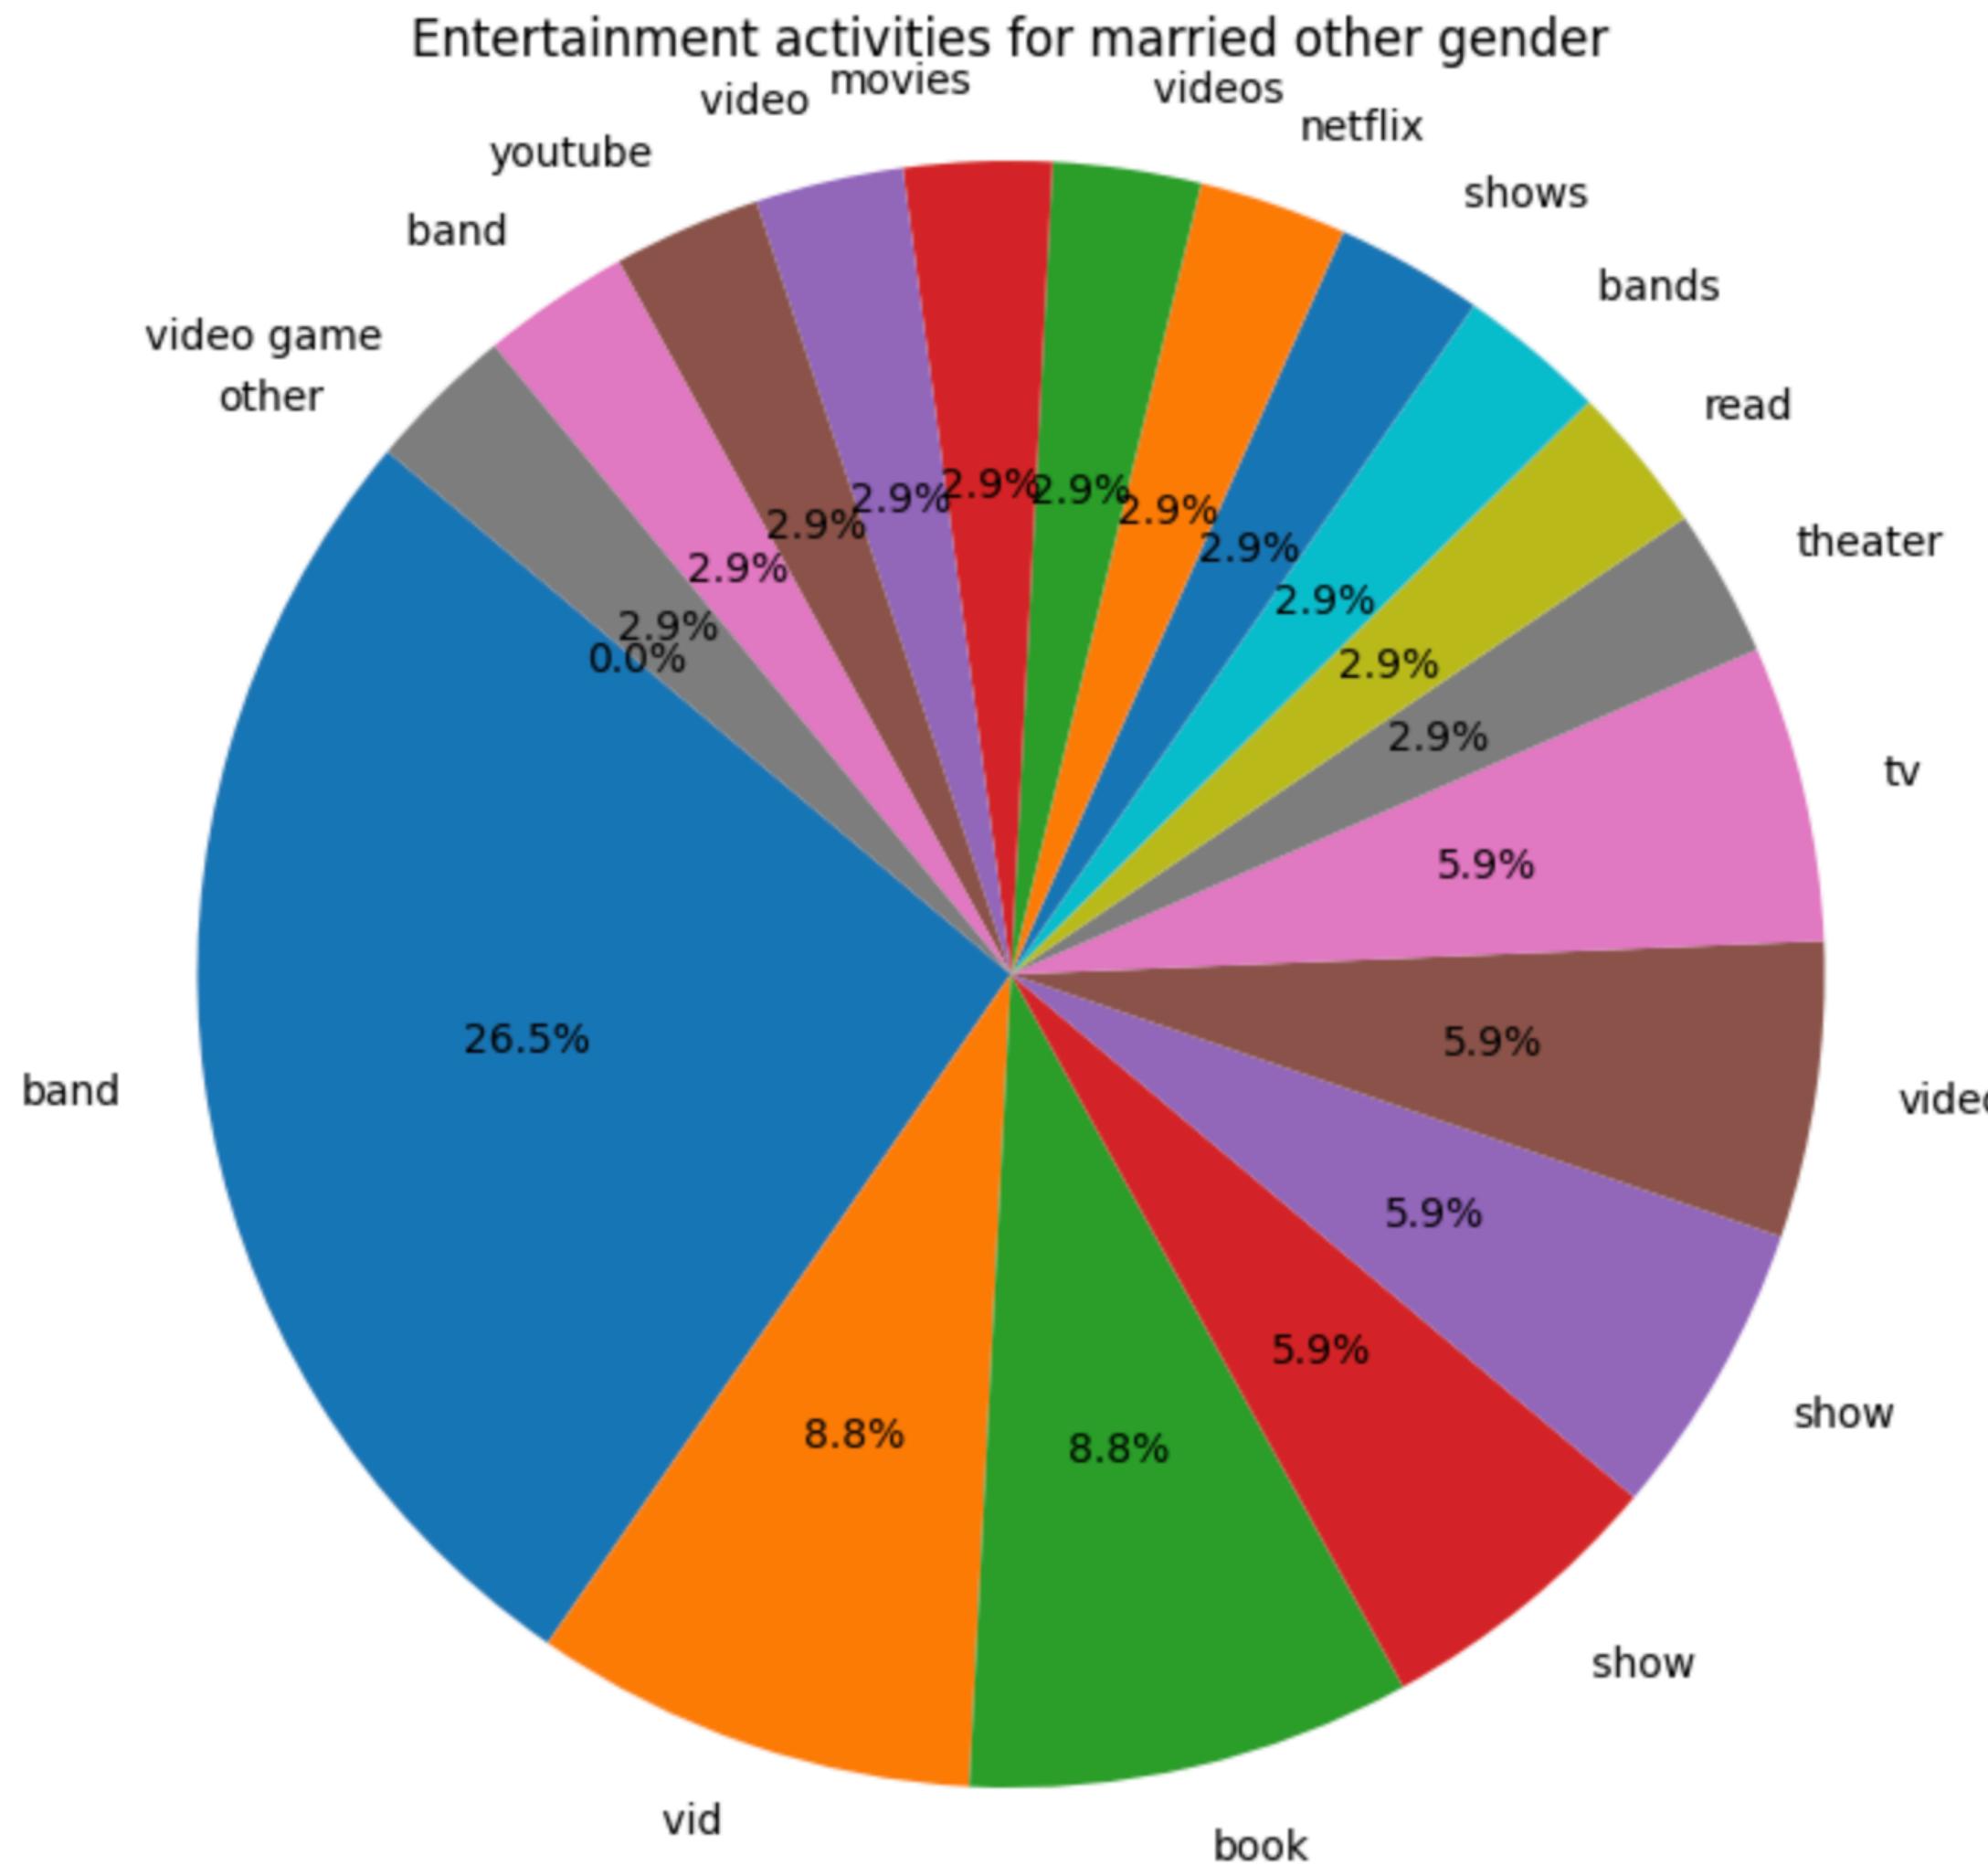

Comparison between single women and married women

The most significant portion of entertainment activities for married women is categorized as band, which comprises 42.3% of the chart and suggest that married women have the great interest for those music activities. However, to those single women, the percentage is 13.7%. At the same time, book and reading also take up 6.9% and 4.2% for married women. Compared to single women, the percentage is decreasing where is 23.2%. This refocused analysis highlights a parallel appreciation for reading between married and single women, suggesting that irrespective of marital status, literature and reading are key entertainment avenues. Moreover, the data suggests that single women might have a slightly more pronounced engagement with shows and books, possibly due to more discretionary time or different social patterns. In contrast, while also enjoying these activities, married women have more engagement across into watching bands and enjoying music.

Comparison between single other gender and married other gender

According to the picture, we can see distinct trends emerge when contrasting the activities of married individuals with those who are single. Married individuals exhibit the higher preference for band music, which takes up a substantial 26.5% of their entertainment activities, suggesting a communal or shared experience that resonates within their social dynamics. In contrast, single other gender individuals seem to have the less engagement in band which is 12.3%. While both groups enjoy visual media and video games, single individuals allocate a bit more of their time to gaming, which could offer a form of interactive escapism or a means to connect with others virtually. The data indicates that marital status among other gender individuals is a factor that may shape and shift entertainment preferences, where married individuals lean towards shared musical experiences and single individuals towards more individualistic activities such as reading and gaming.

Conclusion

- According to the finding, marriage influence people's entertainment activities for all genders but from different angle. People's hobbies and entertainment activities will be changed. People's hobbies and entertainment activities are more or less influenced by marriage because marriage will brought certain influences to people. Before marriage, you may pay more attention to your personal time and space. You can decide your actions and plans according only to your own wishes, where are less constraints and restrictions. After getting married, you need to consider your partner's needs and schedule . You need to discuss and decide on some daily life matters together, such as time allocation, household chores, etc., in order to better coordinate the lives of both parties. Such factors have also led to changes in entertainment activities. Sometimes one's entertainment activities will be influenced by the other's. Marriage requires the participation of both parties. Although sometimes marriage can have a certain impact on individuals, it requires more understanding and respect from both of them. Respecting the differences and supporting each other is the key to a better marriage.
